

Info@westacademonline.com

A: Have you been following the news about the upcoming elections?

B: Yeah, I have. It's hard to avoid, especially with all the debates going on. What do you think about the candidates?

A: Honestly, I feel like neither party is addressing the real issues. They keep focusing on topics that divide people rather than finding solutions that unite us.

B: I get what you mean. It feels like there's so much polarization. What issues do you think they should prioritize?

A: Well, for starters, climate change is a huge problem. We're running out of time to act, but it hardly gets the attention it deserves. What about you?

B: I agree, climate change is critical. For me, healthcare is another big one. People are struggling with high costs, and it's just not sustainable.

A: True. It's frustrating how much money is spent on campaigns and political ads instead of tackling these problems.

B: Exactly. And it's all about winning rather than working together for the greater good. Do you think there's a way to fix this system?

A: It's tough. Maybe if there were more transparency in campaign financing and stricter regulations on lobbying, it could help. But that would take a lot of political will.

B: Agreed. And getting people more involved in the process could make a difference too. Voter apathy is such a big issue.

A: That's true. If more people voted and held leaders accountable, it could push politicians to actually deliver on their promises.

B: Definitely. Well, let's hope things improve. At least conversations like this are a step in the right direction.

A: Absolutely. Change starts with awareness and dialogue.